

I sounded the horn at Austin's Race for the Cure-and what an inspiring gathering it was. Each person who took part, each dollar raised, each step taken represents our collective response to the scourge of breast cancer. Since my wife Libby and I co-chaired this race nine years ago, the event has almost quadrupled in size and moved to this year's new location so that even more could participate. I was also pleased that my office ran this year as "Team Doggett." With our many small steps, we can make great strides. We're walking so that one day together we can finally defeat breast cancer-one step, one mile, one dollar, one team at a time.
